Dear Reader:

This product was prepared by the staff of the Federal Research Division of the Library of Congress under an interagency agreement with the sponsoring United States Government agency.

The Federal Research Division is the Library of Congress's primary fee-for-service research unit. At the request of Executive and Judicial branch agencies of the United States Government and on a cost-recovery basis, the Division prepares studies and reports, chronologies, bibliographies, foreign-language abstracts, databases, and other tailored products in hard-copy and electronic media. The subjects researched include the broad spectrum of social sciences, physical sciences, and the humanities.

PREFACE

This study is a two-volume reference work on civil violence in India. It is intended as a research aid for analysts engaged in political research on the sub-continent. The two volumes report, chronologically by state, major incidents of domestic unrest in India. The information used in this report is derived primarily from Indian newspapers and magazines and is current as of January 1, 1987. This issue is the first of a series on the subject; updates of the abstracts are anticipated monthly, whereas the summaries will be updated in 3-month intervals.

1. CIVIL VIOLENCE IN INDIA

Civil violence as an expression of social tension is a pervasive feature of Indian society, a daily occurrence ranging in form from small streetcorner confrontations to massive riots involving thousands of people and hundreds of casualties. The seeds of such conflict lie deep within the nature of the Indian state--a highly pluralistic and polyethnic polity characterized by widespread poverty and severely limited public resources. In many instances, the distribution of these scarce resources is the explicit cause of the conflict, whether in the sharing of canal waters or in the distribution of government jobs. In other cases an underlying scarcity has led to other forms of confrontation; the struggle for resources has forced individuals to seek security by banding together into competing communities, dividing frequently along the traditional lines of caste, religion, race, language, and politics. Even where the original conditions of scarcity no longer exist, a long history of competition and resentment between communities has given communal conflict a life of its own, with violent confrontation as the norm.

As different groups come to confront each other, they assume different forms of organization and mobilization that pose correspondingly different degrees of threat to the established social order and the state. At the lowest end of the spectrum lie those communal groups that are tied loosely together by a common faith or language and, in some instances, by the trappings of a political party. Violence among such groups has several distinctive features. First, it is likely to occur continuously at a low level, triggered by daily confrontations such as traffic accidents, drunken brawls, or robberies. Second, violence at a higher level occurs frequently in a cyclical pattern, flaring up at predictable intervals on important occasions on either the civil or the communal calendar (most notably election periods and religious festivals). Finally, when directed against the state, the violence is likely to be targeted at a single issue or event, such as a proposed change in lower-caste job quotas or the alleged mistreatment of a communal leader. In such instances, the violence may become widespread, extending over an entire district and involving a major disruption of social order. Nonetheless, because of the low degree of communal organization and the relatively limited cause of the unrest, the disruption is likely to be of short duration and poses no long-term threat to the state. (The Hindu-Muslim conflicts in Gujarat and the Konkani riots in Goa are both of this type).

Groups combatting the systematic abuse of political and economic power tend to form more tightly knit organizations that depend less on spontaneous public mobilization and more on the directives of a small group of leaders. (The Gorkha National Liberation Front belongs to this category.) As a result, the communal, cyclical pattern observed above is less evident, and violence tends to occur during planned campaigns of unrest and protest (which may or may not coincide with national or religious holidays). Still, because these groups continue to compete within, or on the fringe of the legal political arena, their activities continue to reflect the political rhythms of the state. In groups of this nature, mobilization occurs through affiliation in a specific organization rather than through membership in a loose community of faith or ethnicity. Consequently, episodes of violence do not automatically stir up an entire community. Instead, the degree of participation and the overall level of violence depend upon the extent of public disaffection of the community at large and the degree to which the community sees its interests represented by a specific organization. In general, civil violence of this type involves a smaller proportion of the population than the communal uprisings described above. Nonetheless, because this conflict is more carefully coordinated through a coherent political force, it can pose a more serious challenge both to the current ruling parties and to the authority of the state itself.

A final category of violence involves those groups which represent both an extreme level of disaffection from the established order and a high level of organization. Because their goals are frequently illegal in nature, involving "liberation" from the union government and the creation of new polities, these tightly organized, extremist groups tend to work clandestinely. Some have military or armed wings and even entire shadow governments. Although the size of these extremist groups depends on the level of alienation in the broader community, their violent activities are orchestrated and carried out according to decisions by their leaders and thus are largely free of communal rhythms and political necessities. While the leadership may decide to raise the level of violence to mark particular occasions (such as the anniversary of a martyr's death), the violence tends to be sporadic and less predictable. These groups present the highest level of threat to the unity and social order of the state.

With this typology of violence as a general background, it is important to note both the tremendous fluidity of categories and the way in which a single movement or communal conflict can operate simultaneously within different categories. As an example of this fluidity, the Mizo National Front, an extremist group that sustained a disruptive insurgency in the 1970s, has become a mainstream political party in league with the Congress(I). This change in political category is due largely to the central government's efforts at political reconciliation. Conversely, the Akali Dal, the party representing the Sikh community, is being increasingly coopted by extremist and separatist forces as the local governments of Punjab and Haryana delay the implementation of the critical Punjab Accord. These cases of radical evolution demonstrate that the political responses of the state and union governments play a vital role in determining the type and intensity of civil conflict. As of March 1987, this governmental power for constructive or deleterious intervention was most apparent in the development of the Gorkha movement in West Bengal.

Just as a movement can evolve over time through different organizational patterns, it can operate concurrently on several different planes. The Sikh separatist movement has gained the most publicity for the dramatic extremist attacks that almost daily punctuate life in the Punjab. These attacks are the work of a small and largely identifiable group of militants who regularly claim responsibility for their "liberation" efforts. Parallel to these extremist activities are confrontations of a different nature; factions of the ruling Akali Dal and the opposition Bharatiya Janata Party regularly use open political mobilization to initiate strikes and protest demonstrations which lead to violence. At the same time, the annual cycle of religious festivals brings on undirected violent confrontation of a purely communal nature. Despite this great range in methods and forms of violence, these activities can not be viewed as separate movements; the people involved are frequently the same, and a surge in one type of violence tends to promote increases in the others.

While the aforementioned categories provide a useful measure of the types of confrontation, they should not be seen as restrictive or static; a central feature of Indian civil violence is its tremendous fluidity. It is able to exist for generations in unchanged patterns, yet able to adopt new patterns rapidly as the political or economic environment changes.

2. SUMMARIES

a. National Trends

Throughout the 1985-86 period, violence in India remained predominantly local, arising from conflicts and resentments limited to specific states and frequently to individual regions within a state. There was, consequently, little common ground for intraregional cooperation; the various extremist and communal groups showed no sign of any coordination that would pose a unified threat to the central government.

Aside from the common cycles of violence during elections and religious festivals, violent activity exhibited local fluctuations, frequently in response to indigenous political imperatives. The anti-Hindi stir in Tamil Nadu and the pro-Konkani movement in Goa are both examples of the increasing willingness of local politicians to exploit communal resentment for their own political ends.

Despite these geographical limitations to civil violence, several ways were evident in which violent incidents in one state influenced events elsewhere:

- o In areas where state boundaries did not correspond to ethnic divisions, activities of a single insurgency extended beyond a single state (as evidenced by the attacks of the National Socialist Council of Nagaland, which occurred in Nagaland, Arunachal Pradesh, and Manipur). In addition to this inter-state activity by single groups, in late 1986 the press reported broader cooperation by a number of tribal groups, including the Tripura (Tribal) National Volunteers, the United Liberation Front of Assam, and the National Socialist Council of Nagaland. In the 2-year period from 1985-86, however, there was little evidence of actual coordination of activities among these dissident groups.
- o Communal conflicts in one area tended to set off confrontations in other areas with similar communal divisions. This reaction occurred almost universally in the absence of formal organizational links between the two areas. In 1985, extremist incidents in the Punjab led to violence in the adjacent states of Haryana, Rajasthan, and Delhi. Comparable incidents occurred in Hindu-Muslim relations: the legal battle over a disputed shrine in Uttar Pradesh in February 1986 had repercussions in Madhya Pradesh as well as in Jammu and Kashmir. Similarly, the publication of a short story entitled "Mohammed The Idiot" led to rioting in Karnataka in December 1986. Although the story itself was not derogatory to the Muslim community, its republication in a Jammu and Kashmir newspaper 3 weeks later was also the cause of widespread disorder. In each of these instances, both the spread of violence and the severity with which it reappeared elsewhere depended on the level of preexisting tensions in each area. This "secondary" violence was therefore not exogenous; although the timing of an individual outburst may have reflected outside influences, the violence itself occurred purely as a product of local tensions.
- o In July 1986, the Mizo National Front (MNF) and the central government signed the Mizoram Accord, ending an extended period of separatist insurgency. The successful negotiation of this agreement and the broad concessions won by the MNF served to confirm the effectiveness of violent agitation. Because this accord was a victory for both the MNF and the ruling Congress(I) Party, it received wide coverage in the media, and most likely played an important role in the decision of other groups to step up their drive for statehood. This acceleration was visible in the activities of the Gorkhas in West Bengal, the Tripura (Tribal) National Volunteers in Tripura, and the pro-Konkani activists in Goa, all occurring in the second half of 1986. Again, while these activities were concurrent, direct interaction between the groups involved is not evident.

In most of the instances discussed above, the media served as the critical link, occasionally joining the local cycles of communal agitation into broader patterns of national reaction.

b. Bihar

Bihar was among the states with the highest levels of continuing violence, but most incidents took place in remote rural areas over very narrowly defined local issues; therefore, reportage in the national press was frequently delayed and incomplete. The major line of division within the state lay between upper caste landowners and landless lower caste laborers. The conflicts themselves centered on land ownership, use of public water supplies, and the treatment of Untouchables by local authorities.

In a typical incident of violence, a gang from one caste group attacked a family or village associated with the rival caste, frequently making a surprise assault at night and using knives and stones rather than more sophisticated weapons. Attacks were usually in retaliation for previous assaults by the rival group, and in many cases they gained attention in the Indian press for their extreme brutality. Gangs from the upper castes (for example, the Rambachan Yadav gang) and the lower castes (for example, the Chhangur Dusadh gang) used the same assault tactics. Nonetheless, because the latter groups were frequently associated with Marxist organizations, such as the Indian People's Front and the Maoist Coordination Center, their attacks were commonly characterized as extremist, whereas high-caste violence was more likely to be identified as criminal activity. In both cases, the conflict straddled the line between communal and extremist violence, combining the broader participation of the former with the clandestine nature of the latter.

Throughout the 1985-86 period, violence in the state was sporadic, occurring in local cycles of retaliation with a relatively small number of participants involved in each case and with little evidence of any broader coordination. During state-wide elections, however, the alignment of caste interests with particular political parties led to widespread mass violence around the state. In March 1985, election violence left 63 dead and more than 200 injured.

A lesser source of violence in Bihar involved the small tribal population in competition with nontribals over land and water resources (for example, the Adivasi attack of April 1985 in which 15 were killed).

c. Delhi

Violence in Delhi during the 1985-86 period was largely a reflection of the situation in Punjab, with Hindu-Sikh communal clashes following on the heels of each major incident of extremist violence to the north. Because of the communal nature of the conflict, as a spontaneous reaction of unarmed and unorganized citizens, the violence led to relatively few deaths, but a very large number of injuries.

Major incidents include the demonstration against the Punjab Accord in December 1985, in which reportedly 70,000 Hindus took to the streets and as many as 6,000 were arrested. Although no one was killed, 34 policemen were injured. Similar demonstrations occurred in the wake of the Punjabi bus massacres in July and December 1986.

In addition to the sporadic outbursts of reactive violence, annual religious processions in Delhi provided more cyclical and predictable patterns to the communal tension. Both the Hindu Ramlila in October 1986 and the Sikh observance of the martyrdom of Guru Teg Bahadur in December 1986 were occasions of widespread rioting.

Sikh extremist violence from the Punjab also impinged directly on the capital, most destructively during a bombing campaign in May 1985 which left 42 dead in Delhi itself, and as many more elsewhere across north India. In addition, extremists targeted a number of Congress(I) politicians, particularly those believed to be responsible for anti-Sikh riots in December 1984. Although no definite proof has emerged, Sikh separatists also may have been involved in the attempted assassination of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi in October 1986.

Although Hindu-Sikh tension was the dominant cause of civil strife in Delhi, other religious and political tensions gave rise to violent outbursts. Since 1985, the minority Muslim population has taken to the streets on two occasions to protest the Hindu occupation of disputed religious centers. In addition, as the seat of both the national and the local government, New Delhi was the target of a number of political agitations, including a protest against fuel-price hikes in February 1986 in which more than 1,000 people were arrested and 300 injured.

d. Gujarat

During the spring and summer of 1985, a tremendous wave of violence in Ahmedabad arose stemming from two parallel sources of tension. The perennial Hindu-Muslim conflict, reflecting the religious calendar, broke out in violence during those holidays which included public processions. Much more disruptive, however, was the conflict among Hindus as a proposed change in government policy brought members of high and low castes into the streets to riot.

In February 1985, the state government of Gujarat announced a plan to increase from 10 percent to 28 percent the proportion of university positions reserved for the lower castes. (Lower-caste Hindus represent approximately 56 percent of the state's 34 million people.) Upper-caste students immediately began to protest, and on 18 March widespread rioting broke out in Ahmedabad. The army was summoned to restore order and was successful after a week of the rioting. As security forces began to relax curfews in mid-April, however, the violence resumed and spread to the surrounding towns of Broach, Baroda, and Surat. Over the next 4 months, periods of violence alternated with those of relative calm as the army tried to control incidents of arson, stone-throwing, and stabbings. In late July, the rioting came to an end when the government agreed to withdraw its proposal to increase lower-caste quotas. From August 1985 through the end of 1986, intercaste violence continued sporadically at a much lower level, flaring up briefly in January 1986.

Over the same period, conflict between the Hindu and Muslim populations of Ahmedabad occurred almost exclusively during major religious holidays. In June 1985, the Hindu chariot festival (Rath Yatra) coincided with the last day of the Muslim Ramadan, both holidays occurring while the city's intercaste rioting was at its height. In defiance of a police ban, Hindus conducted a procession through a Muslim area of the city, using elephants and cows to break through police barricades. In the ensuing riot, 8 died and 34 were injured. During the same festival in 1986, the conflict spread to Broach and Baroda. The state deployed 17 companies of paramilitary and the riots left 49 dead.

Other smaller-scale confrontations took place in Baroda at the Festival of Lord Ganesh (September 1985 and again in September 1986) and in Verval during the Festival of Holi (March 1986). A single incident not associated with a religious festival occurred in August 1986, when the random firing of an unidentified gunman led to 4 days of rioting.

e. Jammu and Kashmir

Muslim antinational agitation and Hindu-Muslim tensions led to several periods of widespread rioting over the 1985-86 period, finally bringing about a major political realignment. The perennial sources of unrest in the state--police abuses and the charges of discrimination in politics, education, and employment--were supplemented by external sources: Hindu-Muslim conflicts elsewhere in India caused sympathetic vibrations within the state, leaving Kashmir as a barometer of the relations between the two communities throughout the nation.

From 1985 to early 1986, violence was sporadic and reactive, occurring largely in response to single, narrowly focused events. In April 1985, the death of a student in a bus accident sparked 2 days of rioting. One month later, a Calcutta court petition to ban the Koran led to street fighting that left more than 100 injured, while an attempted assassination of former Chief Minister Abdullah Farooq in July caused similar unrest.

Nineteen eighty-six witnessed more extended periods of violence that posed a serious threat to the public and political order. The turmoil began in reaction to an external event: in mid-February 1986, a court in Uttar Pradesh permitted a Hindu group to reopen a religious site that had been claimed by both Muslims and Hindus. The decision instantly kindled street fighting in Srinagar. After 3 weeks of continuing tension, the Congress(I) withdrew its support from the National Conference Party, reducing it to a minority in the Assembly. In early March, Chief Minister Ghulam Mohammed Shah resigned; elections scheduled for that month were cancelled; and the state was placed under Governor's rule.

In August, the central government increased its power over the state in two ways. First, by amending the Constitution, it created a security belt along the Pakistani border--an area patrolled by the army and directly under central control. In addition, the government instituted President's rule when the 6-month period of Governor's rule lapsed in early September. This effectively brought the entire state under the control of the government in New Delhi. At the same time, Muslim communal groups worked to coordinate their efforts and to mobilize a larger segment of the population against the growing powers of the central government. Shortly after the formation of the Muslim United Front in September, the authorities arrested several major Muslim leaders, leading to an extended period of riots and strikes. The government responded with a massive deployment of paramilitary forces while concurrently opening negotiations with Abdullah Farooq, former Chief Minister. By late October, the central government's political and security maneuvers had succeeded in restoring order, paving the way for the formation of a new coalition government under Farooq.

Communal resentment surfaced again in the final days of 1986 when a Srinagar newspaper republished a short story, "Mohammed The Idiot," which had caused rioting in Karnataka only a few weeks before. The Srinagar police were forced to open fire to contain the resulting outburst, which left more than 70 people injured.

f. Maharashtra

Compared with many of its northern neighbors, Maharashtra had a low level of civil violence during 1985-85, with a number of incidents representing spillovers from the conflicts of neighboring states. The most serious of these incidents was the assassination of General Arun Vaidya, former Chief of Army Staff, in Pune in August 1986. The assailants in this instance were Sikh militants from Punjab, and the killing was motivated by Vaidya's role in the army storming of the Golden Temple in June 1984 (see Punjab). In addition, the murder of a Sikh priest and his bodyguard in Naned in October 1985 was possibly the work of Punjabi extremists.

Of those incidents that had their origin within Maharashtra, the majority resulted from the state's declining economic conditions. Rioting in Mahune in January 1985 was sparked by striking textile workers. The low level of cotton prices in December 1986 led to increasingly violent activity by the Shetkari Sanghatana (an organization of cotton farmers).

Rising unemployment throughout this period also led to increasingly bitter job competition between the Muslim and Hindu communities. In addition, political activities of the Shiv Sena and the Muslim League served to exacerbate communal tensions, leading to riots in Tankik and Aurangabad in May 1986, and in Amravati and Warud in November 1986. In many instances, the rioting began with a minor local confrontation-- an argument in a gambling den or a bicycle accident--that served as an opening for a broader expression of underlying hostilities. As in other areas of Hindu-Muslim confrontation, religious festivals also were marked by intercommunal fighting (for example, the festival of Lord Ganesh in September 1985).

g. Punjab

Events in the Punjab in 1985-86 were dominated by the activities of the Sikh separatist movement fighting for the establishment of an independent state of Khalistan. Violence remained sporadic, mostly in the form of individual killings by members of extremist groups, with a few larger massacres that sparked rioting across northern India. Throughout 1985, unrest remained at a relatively low level in Punjab itself, whereas in Delhi, Rajasthan, and Haryana, a Sikh extremist bombing campaign left 84 dead. During this period, the central government continued to work with the popular Sikh leader Sant Longowal to reach an agreement on major divisive issues: the release of Sikhs arrested during the 1984 army raid on the Golden Temple, and the proposed transfer of Chandigarh to Punjabi control. The Gandhi-Longowal Accord was signed in July 1985, but Longowal's assassination a month later and the inability to settle the details of the Chandigarh transfer led to increasing tension in the opening months of 1986.

In March 1986, militants extended their control over the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC--Sikh Temple Management Committee, a body with broad powers over the Sikh community and the disposition of Sikh temple funds). Moderate SGPC members were among the large number of casualties during that month, and the government appointed Julio Ribeiro as the new Director General of Police because of the increase in violence.

The level of violence remained high in April and May and surged to even greater levels in June as militant student groups staged massive protests commemorating the storming of the Golden Temple in 1984. In the same period, extremist groups increased the number and severity of their strikes to mark "Sikh Genocide Week." After the militants' April announcement of the formation of Khalistan, the government gradually stepped up its efforts to reestablish order. Therefore, in the wake of the June riots, local police and paramilitary forces staged a massive security operation in the Mand riverine belt, the heart of Khalistan, which included Amritsar, Kapurthala, Gurdaspur, and Ferozepur districts. A total of 19,000 paramilitary troops were reported to have taken part in this campaign.

The general violence decreased markedly in the months immediately following the campaign, and the extremist forces, temporarily deterred from more widespread activity, focused their efforts beyond Punjab through assassination attempts against three major figures seen to be responsible for government oppression. On 10 August 1986 members of the Khalistan Commando Force attacked and killed General Arun Vaidya in Pune, Maharashtra. General Vaidya had been the Chief of Army Staff during the 1984 army raid on the Golden Temple which left more than 300 Sikhs dead.

On 2 October 1986 an unidentified gunman believed to be a Sikh militant fired several shots at Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi during a ceremony in New Dehli. Gandhi was unhurt. Nonetheless, the attempt raised serious questions about the coordination and effectiveness of security efforts and led to a major reorganization of the prime minister's own security apparatus.

The day after the attempt on Gandhi, five Sikh extremists dressed in police uniforms entered the Punjab Armed Police complex in Jullundur and opened fire on Julio Ribeiro, Punjab Chief of Police. Ribeiro had been targeted for assassination because the militants viewed him as responsible for the more rigorous and effective antiterrorist efforts of the preceding months, and because he had gone on record saying that he would trade "bullet for bullet" with the extremists. Although the attempt on Ribeiro's life was unsuccessful, it led to increased fears of widespread extremist infiltration of the police force.

After a brief respite following the massive security campaign, violence in the state reached higher levels in late November 1986 when the militant Gurcharan Singh Tohra was elected president of the SGPC. On the day of the elections, extremists accelerated their campaign of violence with a bus massacre that left more than 20 dead. Two days later, six extremist groups announced their unification under the banner of the Khalistan Liberation Force.

h. Tripura

After a year and a half of sporadic attacks, the Tripura (Tribal) National Volunteers (TNV) accelerated their campaign for an independent state, killing as many as 70 people in November-December 1986. The victims were almost exclusively Bengali Hindu settlers who had moved into the state after fleeing East Pakistan in 1971. At the time of the migration, a large amount of land that had been reserved for tribals was made available to the new settlers. As a result, many tribals were left landless, with as many as 80 percent of them indebted to Bengali moneylenders.

The signing of the Mizoram Accord in July 1986 and its successful implementation over the subsequent months provided a powerful example of the effectiveness of violent separatist agitation; by their long insurgent campaign, the Mizos had succeeded in forcing the central government to the negotiating table and winning the long battle for statehood. Their success encouraged a number of other separatist movements to increase pressure on the government. The growth of violence in Tripura in the latter half of 1986 is a possible response to the Mizoram example. By focusing their attacks on Bengalis living on the fringes of tribal majority areas, the TNV clearly expected to stir up a Bengali backlash leading to broader confrontation between the two communities. A conflict of this nature would cause a major exodus of Bengalis from the areas under the Tribal Autonomous District Council, leaving a clear tribal-majority area in which to press for a separate state.

Through the efforts of the state police, with occasional paramilitary and army intervention, the Left Front government was able to minimize the incidents of Bengali retaliation. Nonetheless, it was largely unsuccessful in confining the activities of the TNV, which was based over the border in Bangladesh. The state government was highly reluctant to allow greater intervention by union security forces for fear of further alienating the tribal population. Efforts at negotiation and reconciliation were further impeded by political rivalry between the Marxist-led state government and the Congress(I).

i. Uttar Pradesh

According to government reports released in 1986, the major victims of civil violence in the state were members of scheduled castes and tribes. Without distinguishing different types or causes of violence, the Ministry of Welfare reported more than 200 deaths and more than 500 cases of injury in these groups in 1985 alone, figures which dwarf any casualty statistics from other sources. Most of these cases were unreported in the media. One notable exception was the clash in Mahadupur in January 1985 which left 18 dead. The violence was reportedly touched off by a personal feud over the ownership of a mango tree.

Of those incidents which were detailed in radio or newspaper reports, the largest number stemmed from tension between the Hindu and Muslim communities. In February 1986, a Faizabad court decision enabled Hindu groups to reopen a disputed shrine in Ayodhya (the Babari Mosque/Ram Janmabhoomi temple) which had been closed for more than 30 years. Hindus throughout the state (and elsewhere in north India) organized victory processions, which in turn led to religious rioting that continued sporadically for 3 months.

The other major source of violence was the Sikh extremist movement in neighboring Punjab. In the terrorist bombing campaign that affected four northern states in May 1985, 20 were killed and 14 injured in Uttar Pradesh.

j. West Bengal

The major source of violence in West Bengal in 1985-86 was the Gorkha movement in Darjeeling. Under the leadership of Subhas Ghising, the movement carried out agitation for an independent Gorkhaland, variously defined as either an autonomous region within West Bengal or a separate state. The Gorkhas became active in April 1986 when the Gorkha National Liberation Front (GNLF) spearheaded a series of strikes to protest the uncertain status of Nepalese living in India. One of the main targets of the protest was the Indo-Nepalese Treaty of 1950 which guaranteed freedom of movement across the border and the protection of Nepalese citizens working in India. The Gorkhas argued that the treaty, by offering equal treatment to recent immigrants and long-term settlers, deprived the latter of the full rights of Indian citizenship.

Beginning as a protest movement, the Gorkha cause became galvanized in July 1986 when police fired upon demonstrators in Kalimpong, killing 11 men, women, and children. When riots ensued, local authorities were forced to call out the army to restore order. Over the following months, the GNLF extended its protests against the state's ruling party, the Communist Party of India (Marxist) (CPI(M)) and supporters of the two groups engaged in regular skirmishes. GNLF members tried to enforce blockades around CPI(M) strongholds, especially in the tea estates of the region, leading to regular violent confrontations. In addition, the GNLF conducted a campaign of arson against Marxist supporters, leading the army to intervene once again in October 1986.

By December 1986, clashes between the two groups were occurring almost daily, leading Indian commentators to speculate that Ghising was not fully in control of the movement and that younger more militant elements had succeeded in creating alternate power structures within the Front.

The strong political rivalry between the ruling CPI(M) and Gandhi's Congress(I) played an important role in the growing instability of the region. Because of this antagonism, the union and state governments were unwilling to work together in handling the GNLF challenge, and their public bickering served to strengthen the prestige of the Gorkha movement locally.

Despite the separatist pretensions of the GNLF, the movement offered no serious threat to national unity during this period. In both its apparent organization and the types of activities undertaken, it continued to function more as a communal body than an actual insurgency.

k. Other States

(1) Andhra Pradesh

Political tension dominated this period, with 4 days of post-election riots in March 1985 and violent conflict between Marxist groups in November. Unspecified communal violence in the fall of 1986 left five dead.

(2) Arunachal Pradesh

Extremist violence from Nagaland spilled over into the state in July 1986 as National Socialist Council of Nagaland guerrillas attacked an army patrol.

(3) Assam

Sporadic assassinations and bombings left at least seven dead over the 2-year period. While press reports did not identify any perpetrator, spokesmen for the United Liberation Front of Assam claimed to be stepping up their activity. In a border dispute, Naga tribals and police attacked Assamese villages in June 1985, leaving at least 50 dead. The state was forced to deploy the army to quell the violence.

(4) Goa

In December 1986, the Konkani Porjecho Avaz (KPA--Voice of the Konkani People) launched a campaign demanding statehood for Goa and recognition of Konkani as the official language. The campaign was timed to coincide with the 25th anniversary of Goa's independence from Portugese rule. Violent clashes between KPA supporters and members of the Marathi-speaking minority forced the government to call in the army and the Central Reserve Police Force. A government offer of statehood and negotiations on the future status of the two languages were instrumental in restoring civil order.

(5) Haryana

Hindu-Sikh tensions from Punjab were the major cause of violence over this period. A Sikh bombing campaign in May 1985 killed 19. In January 1986, a linguistic survey related to the controversial transfer of Chandigarh incited a violent road-block agitation in which 190 were injured.

(6) Himachal Pradesh

The central government reports one dead and nine injured in violence against scheduled castes and tribes in 1985. No other information is available for this period.

(7) Karnataka

Political conflict was prominent from the electoral violence of January 1985 through the Congress(I)/Janata clashes in the final days of 1986. A 5-day cutoff in drinking water in June 1986 brought 5,000 demonstrators into the streets in Belagundi. Underlying other tensions was the conflict between Hindus and Muslims. The publication of a story "Mohammed the Idiot" in a prominent newspaper led to rioting in Bangalore and Mysore in December 1986.

(8) Kerala

Opposition Marxists initiated strikes against government corruption and indifference in October 1985 and August 1986, the latter occurrence leaving more than 100 injured. Smaller incidents in December 1986 were possible instances of Hindu-Muslim confrontation.

(9) Madhya Pradesh

Intercaste violence between Hindus dominated the period, with government statistics reporting 75 deaths and more than 300 injuries in 1985 alone. These tensions flared up in February 1985 when the government proposed changes in its reservations policy (involving quotas of government and university positions reserved for member of lower castes). Over 200 people were injured in riots in Bhopal and Indore. An Uttar Pradesh court order giving Hindus access to a disputed shrine led to Hindu-Muslim violence in Sehore in February 1986.

(10) Manipur

Naga tribal insurgents extended their campaign into Manipur, periodically ambushing patrolling security forces and assassinating a former Finance Minister. The People's Revolutionary Party of Kangleipak was also implicated in one attack in November 1985.

(11) Meghalaya

No information is available for this period.

(12) Mizoram

No individual accounts of violence are available for this period. Through mid-1986, the insurgent Mizo National Front (MNF) engaged in regular violent attacks against non-Mizos. In July 1986, the Mizoram Accord with the central government brought the MNF to power and ended insurgent violence.

(13) Nagaland

Naga tribal insurgents of the National Socialist Council of Nagaland periodically attacked patrolling security forces. In March 1986, the central government tried to broaden its powers in the area by extending the Disturbed Area Security Belt along the Indo-Burmese border. The Naga Students Federation responded with a violent strike in which 2 were killed and 60 injured.

(14) Orissa

Incomplete government statistics suggest a low level of violence in this period. One reported incident of conflict during a religious festival in October 1986 was evidence of Hindu-Muslim tensions.

(15) Rajasthan

Reported violence was largely directed against members of scheduled castes and tribes, with the police directly responsible for an attack against Adivasis in November 1986. The bizarre death of a former Prince of Bharatpur in February 1985 sparked violent clashes in which 12 were killed. In addition, the Sikh bombing campaign of May 1985 left two dead.

(16) Sikkim

No information is available for this period.

(17) Tamil Nadu

Demonstrations against local authorities led to violence in December 1985 when fishermen protested their eviction from housing and again the following month when crowds attacked a police station after the death of a man in police custody.

Prime Minister Gandhi's promotion of National Hindi Week sparked a resumption of anti-Hindi agitation in December 1986. The movement was spearheaded by the opposition Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) and became increasingly violent after the arrest of DMK president Karunanidhi. The agitation included bomb attacks in which Sri Lankan Tamil militants are believed to have cooperated. The state government was forced to deploy the Central Reserve Police Force.

Sri Lankan militants of the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front became more directly involved in civil conflict during a street fight in Madras in November 1986 in which one local resident was killed and two others injured.

USER'S GUIDE TO THE DATABASE

DEFINITIONS

In the selection of material for the database from which this report is derived, civil violence is defined as any incident of communal, political, extremist, or other violence that is tied to a pattern of domestic social confrontation. All assassinations and attempted assassinations of major national figures are included. The following types of incidents are excluded:

- o incidents which result only in property damage (through arson, bombing or stoning);
- o border confrontations with foreign nationals and alleged intruders;
- o ordinary criminal violence, or the death or injury of criminals or extremists in the course of apprehension through police and paramilitary operations; and
- o demonstrations and clashes with no reported casualties (unless the event is especially significant in scale or duration, or is closely tied to other important incidents of violence).

The database fields and their definitions are as follows:

DATE: Date of incident, or the first day of the incident if it continues over several days. When the entry represents cumulative data over an extended period, the first day of the period is listed. If the date of the actual occurrence is not available, the dateline of the report is substituted.

EVENT: The name of the Indian state in which the incident occurs, and a brief description of the incident itself, including participants, casualties, government response and source of information. Keywords in the event field permit searching according to selected categories (including violence during elections and religious festivals).

PERPETRATOR and VICTIM: A brief identification of participants according to categories indicated in the list of abbreviations.

Individual participants can frequently be classified into more than one category (for example, a state governor who is also a party leader and a member of a religious community). In such instances, an attempt is made to identify the single category that is most pertinent to the specific conflict described.

Because of the Indian media convention of not identifying parties to a communal conflict, the entry in these fields frequently represents analysis of available information. Where there is considerable doubt in identifying the participants, the entry in the PERPETRATOR field is followed by a question mark. When the parties to a conflict cannot be clearly divided between perpetrator and victim, the names of the two parties are included in both fields.

A participant is labeled extremist (E), as opposed to communal member (C) or political cadre (P), according to the type of activity rather than the specific individuals involved. Assassination attempts or insurgent strikes planned in secrecy are considered extremist incidents, while public demonstrations or protests and spontaneous outbreaks of violence are classified as communal or political (cf. E-Sikh, C-Sikh, and P-Akal).

The classification D (demonstrator) is used as a default category when no identifiable communal or political elements are present in the conflict.

LOSSES: The number of people killed and injured in the incident, reported as a set of two figures divided by a slash (for example, 7/16 indicates 7 dead and 16 injured). Entries reporting cumulative data from separate incidents over an extended period are surrounded by parentheses. Figures of this type are likely to overlap with other data reported elsewhere in the database and should, therefore, not be included in any summation of the numbers provided.

RESPONSE: Government of India response, coded as follows: LP=local police, PM=paramilitary, A=army, U=unknown, i.e. response unreported).
